He's not a book guy: In fact, some advisers say they don't recall seeing him read one or even talking about one beyond his own, The Art of the Deal.

And, as he told us, he's not one for long reports or detailed briefings. One page usually suffices. Bullet points are even better. But he does consume—often in huge doses—lots of traditional media.

He actually can't name any books. As in this transcript from the aforementioned interview with Axios: "I like a lot of books. I like reading books. I don't have the time to read very much now in terms of the books, but I like reading them."

He has no time to read, he said: "I never have. I'm always busy doing a lot. Now I'm more busy, I guess, than ever before. His desk is piled high with magazines, nearly all of them with himself on their covers, and each morning, he reviews a pile of printouts of news articles about himself that his secretary delivers to his desk. But there are no shelves of books in his office, no computer on his desk."
